

IMAGINE :

Urban communities arise. Industrial areas, balconies and parking lots transform into alimentary biotopes, fruit groves and greenhouses; vegetable gardens and bee pastures are set up on rooftops. Creative cells for subsistence and ecological research emerge everywhere. You can see innovative solar installations and genius systems for bionic water circulation and aquaculture. In self-organization people have created social systems in which contact, truth and solidarity become possible again. The communitarian life is characterized by compassion, mutual support and transparency. There no longer exists criminality because a new home and new trust have come into being. Urbanity and rural life are no longer in contradiction; they have permeated each other into a living culture of cooperation.
